INTRODUCTION

When the United States entered World War I, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) launched a campaign of surveillance, infiltration, and prosecution of American radicals that would have a profound impact on the political outlook of the American Left. When the DOJ initiated this campaign, provoked by radical involvement in protests against the war, the American Left was a vibrant and contentious mixture of organizations—democratic, undisciplined, filled with rebellious spirit. Composed of immigrants and natives, farmers, workers and intellectuals, it found organizational expression in two large groups, the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and the Socialist party, which were decentralized in structure and which projected their views through public, legal activity—strikes, marches, rallies, the dissemination of literature, and, in the case of the Socialist party, election campaigns. The Justice Department's campaign of arrests and prosecutions, imitated with equal fervor by state and city governments, made such open agitation difficult to sustain. Newspapers were suppressed. Rallies were broken up. Headquarters were raided and organizational files seized. Key leaders were jailed. (The head of the IWW, William Haywood, and the leader of the Socialist party, Eugene Debs, were both imprisoned for anti-war activity.) The prosecutions not only weakened the Left's two strongest organizations, but also helped change the organizational and philosophical outlook of American radicals. In particular it helped set the stage for the rise of the American Communist party, a hierarchical, centralized organization, as the dominant force on the American Left.

The formation of the American Communist party was a long and convoluted process, orchestrated in large part by Soviet leaders acting under the aegis of the Communist International (Comintern). It was the International, acting at its Second World Congress, which set the rules by which all Communist parties were to function, including the key precept of democratic centralism, i.e., that each level of a Communist party had to accept, without reservations, the decisions of the level above it, with ultimate authority resting in the International itself. But the willingness of many American radicals to join such a hierarchical body, one which willingly followed the instructions of an international executive committee of revolutionaries, cannot solely be understood on the basis of actions in Moscow. The American Communist party, as it finally took shape in the early 1920s, represented a sharp, decisive break with the American radical past. People were willing to join it not only because the Soviet revolution provided a new model of revolutionary action, but because the Department of Justice prosecutions undermined the old one.

The DOJ prosecutions, particularly those launched late in 1919 and 1920 (known as the Palmer Raids) crippled the legal agitational arms of radical organizations. The raids made it difficult for radicals to undertake election campaigns and dangerous for them to hold marches, demonstrations, and rallies. The raids also made it perilous to hand out leaflets during strikes, and they resulted in the suppression of radical newspapers and the closing of organizational headquarters. But above all, the raids undermined the image of America as a democratic political environment where Socialists could disseminate their ideas through traditional legal channels and gradually achieve power through the democratic process. In short, Justice Department activities seemed to suggest that the only way radicals could survive in America was by developing conspiratorial methods of organization. The radicals would have to develop special structures to counteract prosecution, infiltration, and government harassment. And who better to instruct them in these techniques than the victorious revolutionaries in the Soviet Union, who had built their movement in a czarist police state and had come to power through a successful insurrection.

The Justice Department prosecutions that took place in nearly every state in the union did much to change rough hewn, free-spirited radicals into the hardened cadre of a hierarchical movement. By the time the Palmer Raids had ended, Theodore Draper writes, "so many Communists were indicted over the country that everyone in the movement regarded himself as [a] political prisoner or a fugitive from the law." Amidst thousands of arrests and hundreds of deportations, many rank-and-file activists were intimidated into inactivity. But the hard core that remained learned to organize underground, communicate secretly, operate through small cells of trusted individuals, and, above all, to look to Soviet leaders for guidance in building an organization that could survive in such a hostile political climate.

When the Palmer Raids began, there were at least two American Communist parties claiming the sole mantle of the Soviet revolution. Only the authority of the Communist International could force them to merge. Moreover, so convinced were many American Communists that America was a police state (based on the wounds inflicted by the Justice Department) that they refused to form a legal branch of the newly unified party. It required Comintern intervention to get American Communists to form a legal Workers Party that would publish a newspaper and sponsor election campaigns. But while the International pushed the American party in the direction of legality, it also insisted on the retention of many conspiratorial features, including the development of underground methods of communication between the International and the American party based on codes, couriers, and plenipotentiary representatives, as well as techniques of illegally moving people and funds across international borders.

These conspiratorial features, along with the principles of democratic centralism, served to sharply distinguish the Communist party from all previous radical groupings. No other radical party had its policies monitored, and sometimes changed, by a political body located in another country. No other radical organization had such an elaborate system of underground communication that included fake identities, political pseudonyms, and forged passports, enabling people to move inside and outside the United States incognito. But after watching the Justice Department cripple the IWW, weaken the Socialist party, and arrest many leaders of the pro-Soviet Left, early Communists welcomed these innovations as the conditions of political survival in a hostile country. Even when Justice Department activities became less aggressive in the mid-1920s, key Communist leaders bore the scars of persecution; they felt Soviet guidance, and a centralized political structure, gave them the strength to survive where other radicals failed.

There is a great irony here. Those who bemoan the rise to influence of a disciplined party of the Left, wedded to conspiratorial methods of organization, must assign some responsibility to Justice Department prosecutions that destroyed more freewheeling methods of radical opposition. Communists were made, not born; the destruction of democratic radical alternatives by government repression shaped their development as much as the heady achievements of Bolsheviks on the ruins of the Russian Empire.

SOURCE NOTE

The material contained in this micropublication has been reproduced from the holdings of the National Archives and Records Administration, Washington, D.C. Department of Justice Investigative Files, Part II: The Communist Party is part of Record Group 60, General Records of the Department of Justice.

EDITORIAL NOTE

The Department of Justice's records relating to the Communist movement fall into two parts. One is the Straight Numerical Files, which comprise almost 95 percent of the collection, and the other is the Classified Subject Files.

University Publications of America (UPA) made its selection of files for this collection after an extensive search of archival indexes for Communist party publications, Communist party organizations, and names of prominent members of the Communist Party of America.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

The records of the U.S. Department of Justice that concern the activities of Communists and the Communist party can be found in the Straight Numerical and Classified Subject Files of Record Group 60. This edition was compiled following a systematic survey of the entire collection.

Straight Numerical Files

The straight numerical system of record keeping at the U.S. Department of Justice came into existence in 1904. This system assigned each case a six-digit number when it was opened. The Straight Numerical Files run in numerical order on a case-by-case basis, regardless of the subject. This also means that the files run in rough chronological order because each file was assigned a number higher than the previous file. The documents within each section are arranged in reverse chronological order.

The overwhelming majority of the records in this microfilm collection can be found in the Straight Numerical Files. The documents provide a first-hand account of Communist activities through correspondence, reports, and memos of the Attorney General, U.S. attorneys, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (and also its predecessor, the Bureau of Investigation), state and local officials, and various Communist and non-Communist organizations and individuals. These records deal with a myriad of topics that reflect the period from World War I to World War II. These topics include the following: Communist activities; world-wide Communist and anti-Communist activities; the formation of utopian colonies; the Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA) election campaigns; propaganda efforts; union organization; May Day activities; protests against the Sacco-Vanzetti and Scottsboro boys' prosecutions; Communist activities among the black community; investigations and raids by the U.S. Department of Justice; and protests against pro-German and fascist activities. The cases include such Communist-related organizations as the Young Communist League; the International Labor Defense (ILD); National Committee of the Foreign Born; International Workers Order (IWO); American League Against War and Fascism; the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers; and the Workers' Ex-Servicemen's League. The cases involved such individuals as John Reed, Gregory Weinstein, William Z. Foster, Earl Browder, Morris Hillquit, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Harry Bridges, Vito Marcantonio, Emma Goldman, Marcus Garvey, and Louis C. Fraina.

Classified Subject Files

The classified subject system of record keeping at the U.S. Department of Justice came into existence in 1914. The Classified Subject Files are arranged by a subject-numeric system. This system uses a numerical file designation usually made up of various parts separated by dashes. The primary classes usually represent a federal law or administrative subject, and each class is symbolized by a number that constitutes the first part of the file designation. The primary class number is followed by a secondary number that further groups the record. The third part of a numerical file designation is known as a consecutive subnumber. This subnumber represents the particular case and indicates its sequence. The exclusive primary class number for the records relating to Communists is 9; the subject file involves World War I matters.

The Classified Subject Files of these records only involve particular individuals, organizations, and publications. Unlike the Straight Numerical Files in the U.S. Department of Justice's Communist collection, which has much material concerning the depression and its effects and the rise of fascism, these particular records are concentrated in the period from 1918 to 1926.

The documents in the Classified Subject Files provide a first-hand account of the activities of various subjects through correspondence, reports, and memos of the Attorney General, U.S. attorneys, the Bureau of Investigation, state and local officials, and various individuals. The records microfilmed in this series concern the anti-war movement of 1918, Espionage Act violations, freedom of speech issues, radical activities among women, American visitors to the Soviet Union, and the Rand School of Social Science. Benjamin Gitlow, Kate Richards O'Hare, and Rose Pastor Stokes are some of the individuals mentioned in these files.

Previously Restricted Material

Both the Straight Numerical and Classified Subject files of Record Group 60 contain enclosures known as Previously Restricted Material. As the name implies, these are records that were not available when these files were first opened for research. Most of these records were restricted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation because they were related to investigations by that bureau and the Bureau of Investigation. These records were later re-examined and released and can be found at the end of the case file of which they were originally a part.

REEL INDEX

Entries in this index refer to specific casefiles in the Department of Justice Investigative Files, Part II: The Communist Party. This edition includes material from the Straight Numerical and Classified Subject Files of the Department of Justice from the holdings of the National Archives in Washington, D.C. Entries contain the casefile number and folder or section number, if more than one. Entries also show the span of years within a casefile, folder, or section number, as well as the number of pages included. In the interest of accessing the material, this index indicates people and subjects, listed in the order of appearance on the microfilm. The initials n.a. indicate that information is not available. The four-digit numbers on the left of each page represent the frame numbers on the microfilm where casefiles or section numbers begin.

SUBJECT INDEX

The following index is a guide to the people and subjects found in the Department of Justice Investigative Files, Part II: The Communist Party. The first number after each entry or subentry refers to the microfilm reel, and the four-digit number following the colon refers to the frame number where a particular casefile begins. Hence, 9: 0835 directs the researcher to the section of a casefile beginning at Frame 0835 of Reel 9. By referring to the reel index of this guide, the researcher will find the casefile number or section number and lists of the people and subjects in that casefile. The people and subjects are listed in the order that they appear on the microfilm.
